

The liars just admitted to one of their hoaxes.

Five years ago, Canadians were told that the remains of some 215 native children had been found buried in unmarked graves at the former Kamloops Indian Residential School.

The media amplified this story without any confirmation that the claim was true. It was enough that a designated victim group had made a claim.

Now, five years later, Canada's Globe and Mail finally admits the truth: there never was any evidence of any of this.

It was "an extraordinary assertion, one that requires proof," the paper said. The paper had not demanded any. It continued:

"That should have been the starting point for the media in May 2021, when the Tk'emlúps te Secwépemc First Nation first issued a press release announcing the 'confirmation of the remains of 215 children of the Kamloops Indian Residential School' through the use of ground-penetrating radar that identified subterranean anomalies.

"The media, including the Globe and Mail, did not initially scrutinize, much less challenge, that assertion. The initial headlines and stories in the media simply stated as fact that the remains of 215 children had been found."

Well, thanks for getting back to us five years on. Better late than never, I suppose. Meanwhile, more than one hundred Canadian churches were burned as a result of this hoax.

The crazies couldn't resist the story, because it played into their world of Christian oppressors terrorizing innocent natives. The entire history of the medieval Inquisition killed fewer people than one of their favorite regimes did on a good afternoon, so in order to continue playing the victim role they have to downplay all that and play up fantasy stories like this one.
