

Here's what they're up to now.

Ursula von der Leyen, president of the European Commission, is speaking of "flattening the curve" -- but she's not speaking about COVID.

She's using that propaganda phrase for a whole new purpose now. The "curve" is energy use.

"So what we have to do," she says, "is flatten the curve and avoid the peak demands. We will propose a mandatory target for reducing electricity use at peak hours and we will work very closely with the member states to achieve this."

They have created this energy problem in the first place, and of course they are positioning themselves as the people who will manage it for us.

States have always thrived on crises, but this is getting ridiculous.

One crisis after the other, always with the elites imposing more mandates and restrictions, and always hurting the most vulnerable people.
