

It was bound to happen, but it's manifesting itself sooner than many people expected:

There's a war brewing inside Trump circles on foreign policy.

It was obvious that some Trump allies had been uncomfortable about all the antiwar talk, because they do have wars they'd like to wage if given the chance, and because it's inconsistent with their propagandistic yammering about "American leadership around the world."

"American leadership around the world," in case you haven't been paying attention, means blowing trillions of dollars, destabilizing countries for no good reason, and then, when even worse regimes take power in those places, claiming to be shocked at this outcome, but of course refusing to accept blame because "nobody could have known" such an outcome would occur.

In fact, of course, any damn fool knew those outcomes would occur, which is why people oppose these interventions in the first place.
