You would think, if we were dealing with normal people, that what we laughingly call our "public health" establishment would have offered a few apologies here and there, or at least indicated they had a little humility, after the disaster of the past two years.

After all, Anthony Fauci told us that there would be a clear difference in outcomes between places that implemented the so-called mitigation measures vigorously, and places that did not.

Well, there wasn't. So you ruined people's lives, businesses, health, serenity, and just about everything else a normal human being cherishes, and it made no noticeable difference at all.

I personally think the absurdity and wickedness of the past two years can be summed up in a single chart, a chart I showed you just days ago but which really says it all:

If Florida, which was attacked nonstop by our "public health" bureaucracy for not following the rules, winds up more than halfway down the list of states in terms of age-adjusted mortality, rather than being at least in the top five, then it was all for naught.

No matter what people try to say to you, just hammer home at that. Age-adjusted Covid mortality (the only figure that matters) reveals no discernible difference between the-follow Fauci places and the be-reasonable places.

(Not to mention the atrocious outcome of hard-lockdown Peru. Had Peru gotten its terrible results after taking a laissez-faire approach you can be certain that we'd never hear the end of it. Instead, silence.)
