

Restrictions are falling left and right at this point.

Vegas casinos are back to 100%, and with no mask requirements. Huge sporting events, and even concerts, are coming back (Foreigner performed in Orlando last week, for example).

And yet, even though the scolds' predictions of "superspreader" effects failed to materialize from the Super Bowl, the college football national championship, or that packed Texas Rangers game we were all warned about, they're still predicting it, and they're still wrong.

A couple of examples, courtesy of Ian Miller.

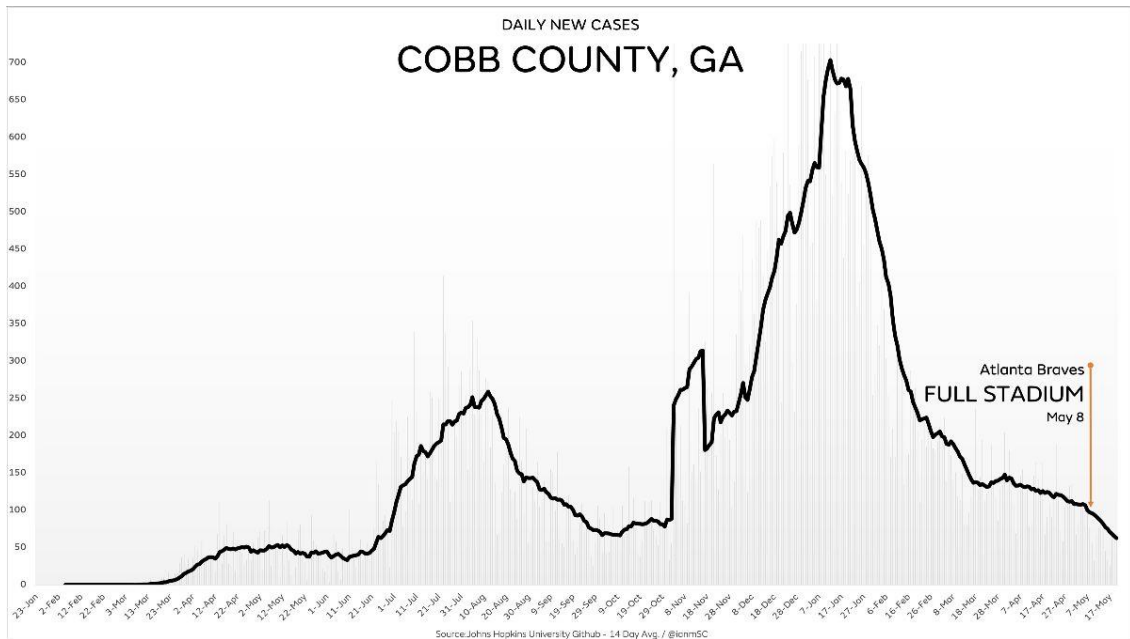

Back on May 8 the Atlanta Braves had their first full stadium since all this started. Nobody was asked about vaccination status.

"570,615 deaths. Nothing to see there."

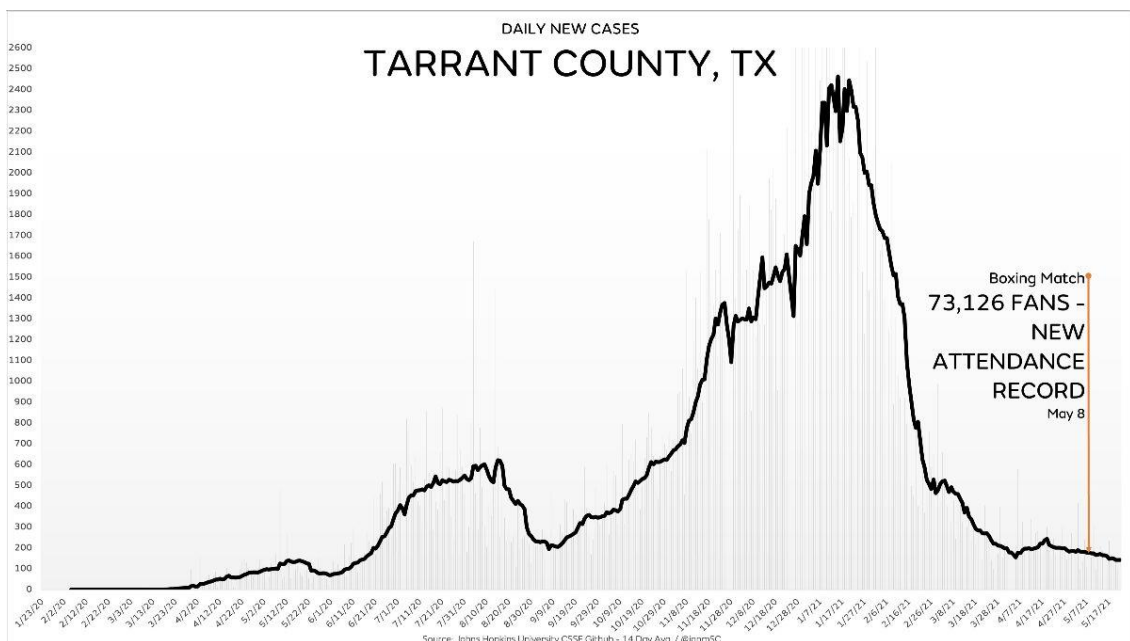

Since King is a mainstream sports journalist, he still -- still! -- thinks the Fauci "mitigation measures" actually do something, and defying them leads to mass death.

Well, two weeks later, here's the massive carnage caused by that event:

Here's something else from two weeks ago: the Canelo Alvarez fight in Texas, a fight attended by over 73,000 people. No indoor boxing event in history has been attended by more people. Nobody checked vaccination status, and not many masks.

Let's check in on the devastation this event surely caused:

The ongoing wickedness in Canada and Europe is predicated on pretending that these things aren't happening. They have to pretend that mass events haven't been going on in the U.S. without any discernible effect.

You'd think the populations of those countries would be demanding an explanation as to why they're still locked down, but, well, I guess they didn't value living as much as you and I do.

Despite the groupthink in entertainment, academia, and (most of) government, there's a clear momentum in favor of restoring normality.

But the long-term effects of what's been done to us are many, and severe.

Now that they've discovered how compliant and unquestioning the general public truly is, who knows what the politicians and what we laughingly call the "public health" establishment will get up to next.

Not to mention vaccine passports, the ongoing wreckage to the economy, inflation fears that this time even the Establishment is worried about, assaults on civil liberties, a school system based on propaganda, and plenty more.
