

Now if Walmart funded the schools, we may safely assume that Walmart Inc. would be cast in a flattering light, so we shouldn't be surprised when the regime's schools urge young people to pay homage to the great presidents who have done so much to improve their lives.

You and I know that the so-called great presidents have done no such thing. I remember as a college freshman, meeting a guy at the first freshman social who urged me to read Modern Times by Paul Johnson, because among other things I would learn that the "great" presidents had been bad presidents, and vice versa.

Stop and think for a second: how is every major U.S. history textbook going to handle the Covid years? Pure propaganda, of course. The government was the great savior, though its selfless work was hindered by stupidheads who hated science.

You know as well as I do that that's how the story will be told.

This in turn reminds me of what Dr. Pierre Kory told me on the Tom Woods Show. Before Covid he'd essentially been a normie. During Covid he noticed the New York Times was publishing nonsense related to medicine -- and that made him wonder: if they're publishing nonsense about something I know a lot about, could they have been publishing nonsense about many other things that I don't know a lot about, and I simply didn't realize it?

Likewise, given that we know Covid will be taught in the textbooks in a completely fact-free way, we are left with the question: what other parts of our history have been distorted and we just didn't realize it?
